

When it comes to protecting the Internet, the Christian Coalition and MoveOn respectfully agree.

The Christian Coalition and MoveOn have joined together to keep AT&T from controlling what you see and do online.

Imagine Yahoo opening at a faster speed on your computer than Google because they paid AT&T a premium price. Or some music provider that AT&T owns moving quickly while iTunes downloads at a snail's pace. That's what's at stake in a battle heating up in Congress. Internet operators like AT&T, Verizon and Comcast want Congress to permanently eliminate "Net Neutrality," the basic rule that prevents providers from deciding which Web sites open easily on your computer. It's a plan to erect tollbooths on the information superhighway. As organizations dependent on a free internet to speak with our members and with the world, we adamantly oppose the elimination of "Net Neutrality."

The free and open Internet has empowered everyday people across the political spectrum to speak out, to be heard and to affect change. Imagine an Internet provider which didn't like the views of MoveOn.org Civic Action or the Christian Coalition. Without Net Neutrality, they could legally slow down our sites or block them altogether.

The SavetheInternet.com Coalition is led by Free Press and includes the Christian Coalition, MoveOn, Gun Owners of America, Craig from Craigslist, small businesses, consumer advocates. More than 700,000 people have signed a petition to Congress. Sign the petition. Call your representative and senators. Join us. This isn't an issue of Right or Left. It's an issue of Right or Wrong.

New York Times
editorial,
May 2, 2006:

"This democratic Internet would be in danger if the companies that deliver Internet service changed the rules so that Web sites that pay them money would be easily accessible, while little-guy sites would be harder to access and slower to navigate. Providers could also block access to sites they do not like."
